Jean-Jacques Rousseau and Karl Marx on the Critique of Property and Dialectic.

By piecing together sporadic references to Rousseau, Marx, and property, several key points emerge. Rousseau and Marx appear to be at odds with one another in their views on property and inequality, but on closer examination, many similarities can be found.

Rousseau and Marx both had the similar notion that property was the root of inequality, even though they both lived in different times and contexts. According to Marx, private property is the result of alienated labor. Private property also allows for the accumulation of wealth and power, which leads to inequality.

Rousseau's concept of the "general will" is similar to Marx's theory of class struggle. The general will is the concept that the collective will of the people is ultimately the guiding principle of society. Marx's theory of class struggle suggests that the struggle between the classes is the driving force of history.
